

Billionaires for Bush

beg for voter suppression with
"BLOCK THE VOTE"

Billionaires for Bush are desperately concerned that everyday Americans will find their way to the voting booths this year, threatening our corporate agenda for the next four years and beyond. Fortunately, we're off to a great start in keeping the rabble from the polls. Have a look at what we're doing in these, and other, key battleground states:

In Ohio, thousands of people who registered to vote might be turned away at the polls.

After seeing voter registration increase 250% in Ohio's Democratic areas, Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell brilliantly insisted on "white, uncoated paper of not less than 80-pound text weight" for voter registration. Good thinking, Kenny Boy!

In Minnesota, nonpartisan observers say that the new voting software system is not ready for the election.

Thanks to our good Republican friend, Secretary of State Mary Kiffmeyer, this year Minnesota is the biggest battleground state using the new, untested, confusing, and cleverly named Help America Vote Act for this election. Minnesota has a long history of honest government, clean elections, and antagonism towards Billionaires – but not for long!

Michigan State Representative John Pappageorge recently told fellow Republicans, "If we do not suppress the Detroit vote, we're going to have a tough time in this election cycle."

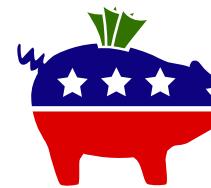

Detroit's population is largely Democratic and 83% African-American. Not only that, but 0% of Detroit residents are Billionaires for Bush – so it goes without saying that we want to block their votes. If they want a say in American politics, they should buy their own president.

Florida Governor Jeb Bush and other state officials are fine-tuning the voter suppression tactics that worked so well in 2000.

Ostensibly investigating "vote fraud", Jeb Bush's policemen are intimidating successful get-out-the-vote activists in the African-American community, including elderly residents in traditionally Democratic communities. This may seem a bit uncivil, but Florida is very important to the Billionaires – so important that we bought Katherine Harris a seat in the U.S. Congress after all she did for us in 2000.

This year, the Billionaires will redouble our efforts to discourage Americans from using the powers vested in them by the Constitution. We will strive to maintain the wonderful plutocracy we've enjoyed under President Bush. We will remind Americans that 50% voter turnout is way too high. November 2 is not a day for Americans. It is a day for Billionaires.

www.BillionairesForBush.com

Billionaires for Bush

beg for voter suppression with
"BLOCK THE VOTE"

Billionaires for Bush are desperately concerned that everyday Americans will find their way to the voting booths this year, threatening our corporate agenda for the next four years and beyond. Fortunately, we're off to a great start in keeping the rabble from the polls. Have a look at what we're doing in these, and other, key battleground states:

In Ohio, thousands of people who registered to vote might be turned away at the polls.

After seeing voter registration increase 250% in Ohio's Democratic areas, Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell brilliantly insisted on "white, uncoated paper of not less than 80-pound text weight" for voter registration. Good thinking, Kenny Boy!

In Minnesota, nonpartisan observers say that the new voting software system is not ready for the election.

Thanks to our good Republican friend, Secretary of State Mary Kiffmeyer, this year Minnesota is the biggest battleground state using the new, untested, confusing, and cleverly named Help America Vote Act for this election. Minnesota has a long history of honest government, clean elections, and antagonism towards Billionaires – but not for long!

Michigan State Representative John Pappageorge recently told fellow Republicans, "If we do not suppress the Detroit vote, we're going to have a tough time in this election cycle."

Detroit's population is largely Democratic and 83% African-American. Not only that, but 0% of Detroit residents are Billionaires for Bush – so it goes without saying that we want to block their votes. If they want a say in American politics, they should buy their own president.

Florida Governor Jeb Bush and other state officials are fine-tuning the voter suppression tactics that worked so well in 2000.

Ostensibly investigating "vote fraud", Jeb Bush's policemen are intimidating successful get-out-the-vote activists in the African-American community, including elderly residents in traditionally Democratic communities. This may seem a bit uncivil, but Florida is very important to the Billionaires – so important that we bought Katherine Harris a seat in the U.S. Congress after all she did for us in 2000.

This year, the Billionaires will redouble our efforts to discourage Americans from using the powers vested in them by the Constitution. We will strive to maintain the wonderful plutocracy we've enjoyed under President Bush. We will remind Americans that 50% voter turnout is way too high. November 2 is not a day for Americans. It is a day for Billionaires.

www.BillionairesForBush.com